This course is a follow-up to Introduction to Political Economy, the initial presentation of nonmainstream economic theories and approaches. The content of Topics in Political Economy varies from semester to semester. This semester, we are going to read and discuss a series of book-length approaches to political economy. We will also view and discuss some classic films in political economy.

I have chosen four books that are considered to be classics of political economy: Adam Smith's The Wealth of Nations, Karl Marx's Capital, Thorstein Veblen's The Theory of the Leisure Class, and Karl Polanyi's The Great Transformation. They are classics in the sense that no student of economics can consider themselves well-acquainted with or knowledgeable about the field unless and until they have studied these books. I have paired each of these books with a relatively recent book that draws on and further develops the concepts and methods of the classics. They are the following: Deirdre McCloskey's The Bourgeois Virtues, Stephen Resnick and Richard Wolff's Knowledge and Class, Joseph E. Stiglitz's The Price of Inequality, and Thomas Piketty's Capital in the Twenty-First Century. At the end of reading and discussing these eight books, students will have acquired an in-depth understanding of some of the key ideas that, historically and today, define and inspire debates within economics from the perspective of political economy.

Another way of learning about political economy is to view films that take up, represent, and extend the ideas of political economy. I have chosen four films that, once again, are considered to be (or are on their way to becoming) classics in the field: Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times, Barbara Kopple's Harlan County, U.S.A., Michael Moore's Roger & Me, and Charles Ferguson's Inside Job. (The films are available on the library's reserve site.)

Organization. The course will be conducted as a combination of lecture and seminar. Therefore, it is important for all students to complete the assigned readings before each session and to participate in the classroom discussions.

Grading. There will be no examinations in this course. Instead, students will be graded on participation in classroom discussions and on biweekly essays, each approximately 450-500 words, due every other Tuesday before class. The purpose of the papers is to “grapple” with the readings—to formulate the main themes, to raise the interesting issues, to pose the key questions—in preparation for the classroom discussions. I will be looking for serious, thoughtful, and well-written critical engagements with the readings. The final assignment is an essay, 2000-2500 words in length, on a recent book or film in political economy. Students should choose a book or film from the Political Economy Reading & Viewing List, and then write a critical essay that (a) addresses the key issues raised by the author or director and (b) relates the author’s or director’s treatment of those issues to the readings, lectures, films, and discussions in the course. Students should feel free to contact me—in person, by office telephone, or by email—to discuss their choices, ways of addressing the book’s or film’s main themes, and other possible references. You need to choose the book or film by 10 November. The essay itself is due by the end of the regularly scheduled final exam time.
