Bank discrimination in transition economies: ideology, information, or incentives?

Brandt, Loren, and Li, Hongbin—Bank discrimination in transition economies: ideology, information, or incentives?

This paper analyzes bank discrimination against private firms in a transition country. Theoretically, we show that banks may discriminate for non-profit reason, but that this discrimination diminishes with the incentives and human capital of bank managers. Employing matching bank–firm data from China, we examine empirically the extent, sources and consequences of discrimination. The survey design allows us to disentangle sample truncation, omitted variable bias, and endogeneity issues. Our empirical findings confirm the theoretical predictions, and also indicate that, as a result of discrimination, private firms resort to more expensive trade credits. Journal of Comparative Economics 31 (3) (2003) 387–413. ### 1. Introduction

The banking sector plays a crucial role in economic transition. Bank behavior determines the hardness of the budget constraints facing enterprises, and thus, influences firm incentives. Banks also play an important role in the intermediation of savings and in the allocation of credit to existing and especially newly established firms. Because of these links and the banking systems' potential effects on the real sector, some observers
